Two new titles from the BMJ's series of books of general interest by medical writers

Portraits from Memory by Sir James Howie

One of the BMJ's most popular series, Sir James Howie's Portraits from Memory is now published as a complete collection. For this Memoir Club edition the author has provided three new portraits, an introductory self portrait, and an appendix in which he comments on the points raised in the widespread correspondence that resulted from the portraits' publication.

Sir James Howie's distinguished career has included appointments as professor of bacteriology in the University of Glasgow, director of the Public Health Laboratory Service, president of the Royal College of Pathologists, and president of the British Medical Association. This book is not about himself, however, but about the memorable personalities he has known in microbiology and in military, hospital, and academic medicine. Essential reading for all students of human nature.

A Natural History of Everyday Life: A biographical guide for would-be doctors of society by Lord Taylor of Harlow

As doctor, politician, and administrator the late Lord Taylor was a key figure in the formative years of some varied institutions: the National Health Service; Harlow New Town (playing an important part in its development and in its industrial health service); and the Memorial University of Newfoundland, of which he was the first president and vice-chancellor. He also laid the foundations of Medicare in Canada by his skilful negotiations to resolve the doctors' strike in Saskatchewan. In his lively and provocative memoirs Lord Taylor relates his "personal voyage" from childhood, through student days at St. Thomas's to his later career in public life, providing on the way innumerable pungent observations together with his views on the origins of some of society's ills—and their cures.
